When Chris Evans tweeted last Thursday about exiting from the role of Captain America, a collective sigh from around the world was audible - manifesting itself in a huge way on social media - fans and celebrities used the medium to express their dismay over the news, and to pay tribute to the actor who has assumed the role of one of our favourite superheroes since 2011's Captain America: The First Avenger. Ryan Reynolds, whose Twitter feed is almost always a riot, replied to Chris' tweet with this: "I'm not crying. I'm weeping. There's a difference." Did you know Chris was actually asked to take on this iconic role? On the Avengers himself two years ago, he admitted he eventually accepted the part because the offer kept coming back. "I was being on out of fear, really. So it kind of for me that whatever you're scared of, push yourself into it," he told Entertainment Weekly. While we're going to miss Chris playing Captain America, we didn't want to see what Hollywood does next with this part-time superhero who first appeared in Captain America comic in 1941. And as for Chris, we're looking forward to seeing him next in Ryan Reynolds' directorial debut Kingsman: The Secret Service in a "modern day gentleman mystery in the classic 'what does a spy' is reimagined by Deadline. Here's a great week!
